

icouldbe.org Brings Online Mentoring to African Universities!

icouldbe.org is an award-winning, non-profit organization that brings students into an original online environment to connect them with professionals in a diverse variety of careers. These adult mentors guide the young people through a dynamic, student-driven curriculum that explores career and higher education options. Students have the freedom to focus on everything from resume preparation and college searches, to goal setting, community service options, internet research strategies and financial literacy modules.

Take a moment to imagine being the first in your family with the aspiration to attend college or to pursue an advanced career. What if you didn't know anyone who could help you to make the important decisions that would help you to achieve your dreams? With no support, where would you start? How many of the dreams of potential artists, doctors, business people or scientists have never been realized simply because there wasn't a caring professional adult available to help, to talk, to plan and to listen? icouldbe.org is a solution that works.

How does E-Mentoring Work?

The most powerful aspect of e-mentoring is that through an online system icouldbe.org can provide a very easy to use, flexible, and meaningful way for professionals to work with young people from underserved communities.

Professionals from hundreds of career backgrounds volunteer as mentors for students (mentees), who are registered on a safe online community, allowing them to engage in one-on-one mentoring relationships based on their shared interests. As a part of this process icouldbe.org provides each mentor/mentee relationship with the staff, training and tools to help students explore their possible futures.

Students and mentors communicate within a secure, online platform. All you need to do is Login. icouldbe.org is active in the United States and East Africa. They are currently looking to initiate online mentoring programs in West African universities.
